I recently wrote my senator, Murkowski from Alaska about the above, and she responded to me by an email dated May 26, 2015, in part, as follows:

While I believe it is important to ensure that Alaskans and all Americans are protected when seeking retirement investment advice, I question whether the DOL has the necessary expertise to expand its jurisdiction over this investment advice. The Securities and Exchange Commission has far more experience and the necessary statutory directive to establish a uniform standard of fiduciary for financial advice.

Can you tell me why DOL is better qualified than the SEC in this particular instance?

Thank you,
