This is not appropriate or reasonable for government to mandate this to anyone in our society. Birth control pills are not medically necessary and pregnancy is not a disease or an accident. Remember, your mother was prolife. If not parents then society should be teaching responsible methods of birthcontrol that promote health and respect. Birth control pills are already available, and if that is the method a women chooses then she should be responsible for her decision and either pay for them herself or find another alternative that is already available. To say that religious institutions that are abundant and provide the community with it's healthcare should be providing this is against there beliefs and if they were to close there doors or sell facilities because of a mandate THEN society would surely be lost.
